

Cooperative Extension Service

Touching the lives of people in every part of New Mexico.

About

The Cooperative Extension Service is the community education arm of New Mexico State University. CES faculty members are attached to all 33 county governments and many tribal areas in New Mexico. There, they can address community needs through education. Backed by state, federal and local funding and statewide faculty specialists, the Cooperative Extension Service is a cooperative effort between NMSU and county governments.

The subjects of CES educational programs are the fabric of life – social development of young people, human nutrition, environmental stewardship, economic development and community development. The most well known CES programs are 4-H youth development, agriculture and natural resources, community economic development, and family and consumer sciences programs. All are means toward the end of developing a better quality of life for families in New Mexico's communities.

CES programs are grounded in research-based information and rely on NMSU statewide faculty members with specialty expertise. In addition to expertise in nutrition, family and child development, agriculture, natural resources, and economic development, the Cooperative Extension Service addresses emerging issues with special efforts that marshal specific expertise. CES has addressed homeland security, financial mediation, public official training, workforce readiness, health issues, and a host of natural resource issues in this way. Statewide CES faculty members attract grant and contract funding to support education programs throughout the state.

Get Involved

CES local office faculty and staff members are networked with partner agencies, organizations and schools in their communities and they rely on local volunteers to help deliver educational programs. The multiplier effect of this approach offers tremendous impact for a modest public investment in Extension education, because of thousands of volunteers and cooperation among hundreds of agencies and organizations.

4-H leaders are the largest volunteer group in the Cooperative Extension Service. Volunteer leaders share their experience and expertise in a wide range of 4-H projects that not only impart skills on a specific subject, but also help develop life skills in young people. Each county Cooperative Extension Service office also calls on volunteers for advice on community needs that Extension should address.
